

RETHINK AND REVISE LITERACY

try one, keep what works

Small experiments for brave teaching.

@lizziehetzer

SWIPE

01

Try not copying that phonics worksheet for tomorrow for morning work and see if you can use a material you have in your classroom already so students can get some purposeful, low-prep practice.

Copied isn't better.

02

Tell students to stop raising hands.

Build in opportunities to respond that allow more than one student to participate.

03

If you do targeted instruction, try 6-10 students with similar needs. More time with the teacher helps kids. And when needs are well matched these groups tend to go well.

04

Add a great launching text for the unit in your boxed curriculum.

In a nonfiction study, poetry and biography is great.

05

Make a runway (or actually two) to allow you to cross north to south and east to west on your rug where kids sit. See if this makes it easier for you to listen to kids when they talk to each other (and also prevents you falling down).

Small experiments can be brave, too.

Save this for back to school.

@lizziehetzer